Verbatim Report Passing.

The American press has often been reprosched with having done away with the full reports of speeches at public meetings and debates in legislative bed-ies, and the reporting of the British press is held up as the true model. The bress is held up as the true model. The stenographic report still survives in the London Times and others of the leading journals of England; but there has been added the moders feature of the preliminary "sketch," or summary with something of running comment, and this has come to be the dependence of most readers, as the English grow nearer and nearer like the Americans in their news paper-reading tastes and habits. now comes no less an authority on pub-lic life than the British premier, Mr. Asquith, and says that he believes he would rather have the "sketch" for his speeches than the verbatim report. At the annual dinner of the Parliamentary Press reporters the other day referring to his having in his day "travelled the whole distance between the opposite extremes of pitiless condensation and litteral transcription" (the parliamentary debaters are strictly classified as to the delaters are strictly classified as to the space to be given them by the reporters' gallery into column, half-column, and mere-mention men), and he believed that the verdict of most public speakers, at any rate of the parliamentary debaters, would be that "the kindly sponge of oblivion is often to be preferred to the cruel fidelity of the verbatim report." Commissioner Harry Blodgett to- drink to their heart's content without fear and without repreach. We have no particulars as yet, but it seems that the usual processes of fermentation and listillation are faulty and that Prof. GOUT & RHEUMATISM Voyle has found a new and improved nethod by which the most divine liquor may be turned out free from all impurities and poisons. There is an old saying that you can ead a horse to the water but you cannot make him drink. If this be true of a beast of very limited intelligence, how much more obviously true it is of a man, and especially of one lastinctively averse from water. Nor is the case al tered at all by substituting Voyle's The Loss from "Busy Lines" whiskey. You can lead the man to it or carry it to him, but can you make the man drink it That is the essen-tial question. Our hot-headed reformers seem to take it for granted you can, and are already talking of "a new era of civilization" and what not. But the event is not so certain. A few years ago we read of a Frenchman who had found a way to make cigars and cigarettes perfectly innocuous. Perhaps he did, but we never heard of any one who

The Volye whiskey is precisely the same case. Harmless it may be, but how are men to be persuaded to drink it? The reform is not nearly so simple as the Prohibitionists seem to think. "It will, of course," writes one, "be the duty of the government, both state and federal, at once to see if this report is authoritative—that all intoxicating liquors should be submitted to the trans forming process, and that not a pint be allowed to reach the public until it has been turned from an instrument of death and misery into one of rational exhibaration and pleasant mental emotion." That sounds easy, but when all whiskey had been rendered jagless the whiskey had been rendered jagless the conscientious toper will reject them and promptly begin to cast about for some intoxicant under another name. The label would not trouble him. Upon the whole we are inclined to be sceptical about the new "harmless" whiskey. If it proves harmless it will probably be because public to the control of because nobody drinks it.—New York-Evening Sun.
